

Meeting with James Jetton, the supervisor of the youth Crosspoint basketball league. He talked about how the people that volunteer to coach in his league all try to build the fundamentals of sportsmanship as well as comradery between the kids, but he emphasized quite a bit that there's only so much that he could try to help these kids with because at the end of the day these kids are anywhere from 5-8 years old just starting to get into basketball. My purpose in talking to James Jetton about these kids is to see if he has any insight on if you can try to help these kids with certain 3D skills at an early age. From what it seems to me however, he doesn't use the 3D approach on these kids. The use of the 3D coaching approach towards these kids in my opinion would likely show the kids at an early age the fundamentals of being an athlete and that being an athlete also means being a good person and that it's all centered around that very aspect.
